Tool Description

This week 2 tool helps me with potential job interviews by showing that I care and also that I am qualified for the position. It also helps me make sure I remember all the information from the meeting and questions I have, so I'm in a better position for the next meeting, and also so I can send a meaningful thank-you note. It also helps me be someone in the workplace whom people enjoy being around, as well as always having confidence in myself.

Message to my developer (Chris):

- My developer and I had been going back and forth for a very long time. This software project was started at the beginning of the summer, and my developer hadn't delivered a product that I thought was of quality. We were slowly getting towards where I wanted it to be, but it was taking forever. So, I decided to reach out. I'm the type of person who avoids confrontation at all costs. That being said, in my previous messages with Chris, I was always very accepting and understanding when he didn't deliver. On September 4th though, I had a different response. I sent him a long paragraph showing my disappointment and how there is some sort of disconnect.
- I made sure to QBQ it as well, though, since I knew I could affect the situation in a positive way. At the end, I told him I wanted to hop on a call so I could explain myself better in terms of exactly what I wanted done on his end. He said he would get on it right away, and we had a very productive Zoom call where I showed him exactly what I wanted done.

This tool was put to work mainly following the “Make it Happen” mindset I learned in class, as well as having confidence. I will also continue trying to be a kind person to my virtual assistant and developer so we can build a long term relationship.
